

STATEMENT

My work is a journey through the possibilities of painting within the limits of the traditional craft. I oscillate between the concepts of figuration/abstraction, painting/drawing, to create a sophisticated canvas where none of them is more important than the other, and the medium itself is the main subject.

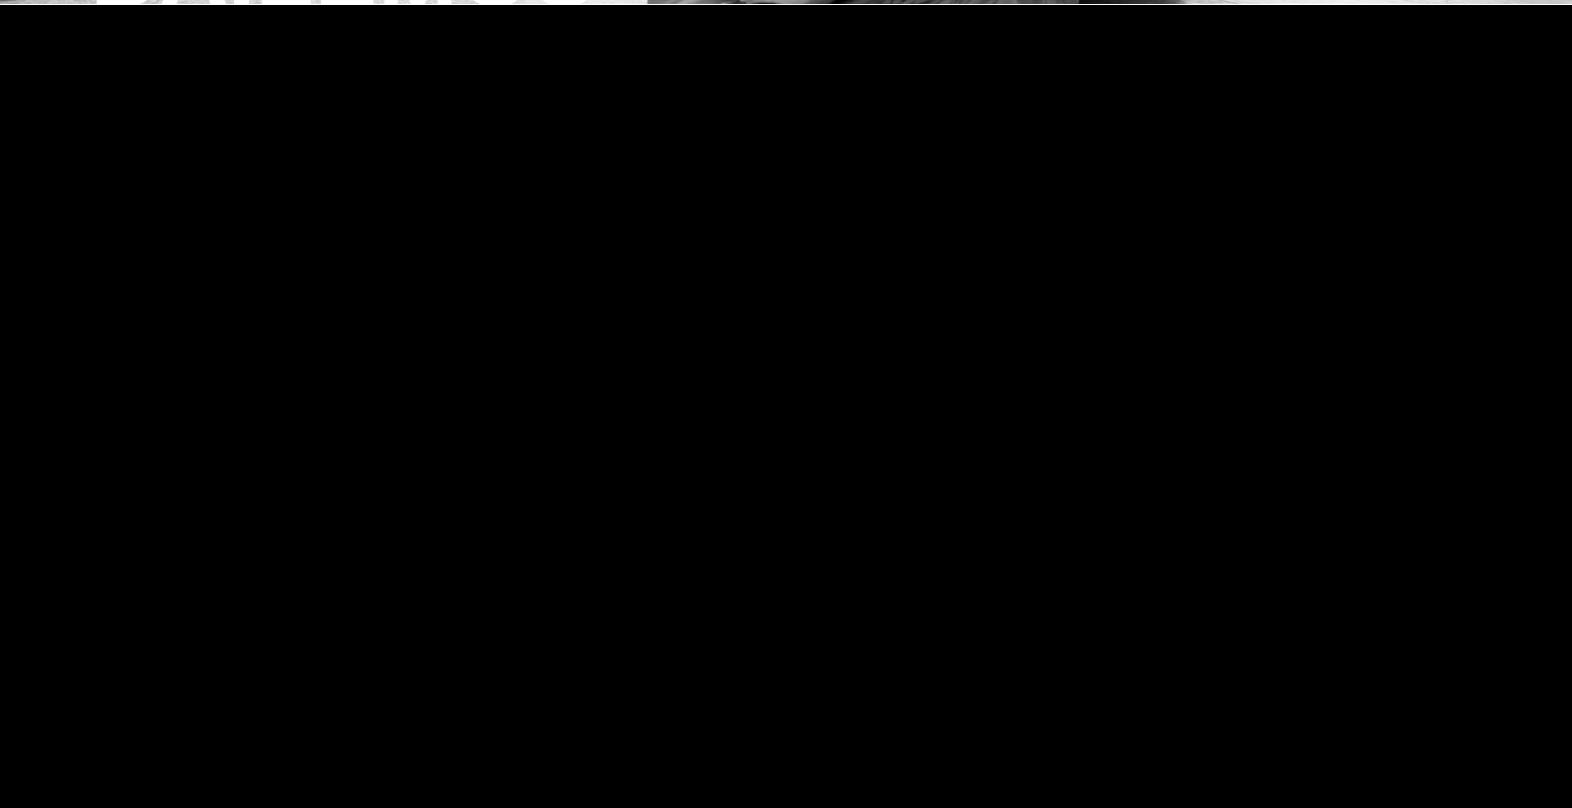

Through each body of work, I question notions of identity, sexuality, and body representation, by confronting modern and ancient images, with roots in popular imagery and art history. In this way I dig into personal contradictions by exploring further my obsession for the human body.

THREE WOMEN

Three Races, Three Graces

Colombian artist David Rodriguez (olive-skinned) invited a white woman (me), a black woman, and a gold woman to do a photo shoot for his project about the dynamic between threesomes of women.

“Dynamic”? It soon turns into a playful romp!

I arrive at the appointed time. David Rodriguez’s studio is in an attic in a dilapidated and picturesque 1930s low-rise apartment complex. Lanes, alleyways, looping electrical cables; steep, dark wooden staircases; shared stone sinks on landings, washing lines and dangling wash-cloths, hubbub of family life in nooks and behind doors.

I reach the top of the house. His door is open. The flat is three simple, frugal rooms filled with David’s oil paintings hung randomly, or leaning haphazardly on walls. None of them, he moans, have fully dried, due to the humidity.

David: laid-back, charming, disarming, his welcoming grin reaching ear to ear. I already know the other two models: Alex, a voluptuous American of Afro-Caribbean heritage, Harvard-educated, feminist, lesbian, in Shanghai to start up a company manufacturing sex-toys; Shin Yi, Taiwanese, who lived for a dozen years in Paris and works in perfume design; uninhibited, free-thinking, liberated, she has an international perspective on the world, as well as being elegant and beautiful, and reminds me of model and photographer Lee Miller. And me? I’m a poet and writer from England where I model unclothed for artists and photographers to pay my bills.

But today is not about earning money. We are four creative people, making something. Before the shoot starts, we women – three graces of three races – strip off and sit around, naked, comfortably warm, drinking Columbian espresso. I’ve got a lazy Saturday feeling. All my stresses are temporarily lifted.

‘So. David: is this about race? About femaleness? Or are you into erotica? Do you want porn?’ Alex is very direct. Puts David on the spot.

‘I don’t know yet.’ Now, David places his laptop on a table in front of us. ‘I’ll show you some images of threesomes of women made by other art photographers and fine artists. See this one: Terry Richardson is well known as an erotic photographer, so the idea to please men – pleasure – is definitely shaping his decision-making. Whereas this one here by a woman photographer, Ellen von Unwerth, is more like two meanings.

‘Ambiguous,’ offers Shin Yi.

‘Yes yes yes. And next, the artist John Currin: some of his work relates to pornography... But it is also about clichés. See – ‘(he points at the grotesque threesome of females arranged around a cooked turkey) – ‘it’s complicated. I mean, is his motive ironic?’

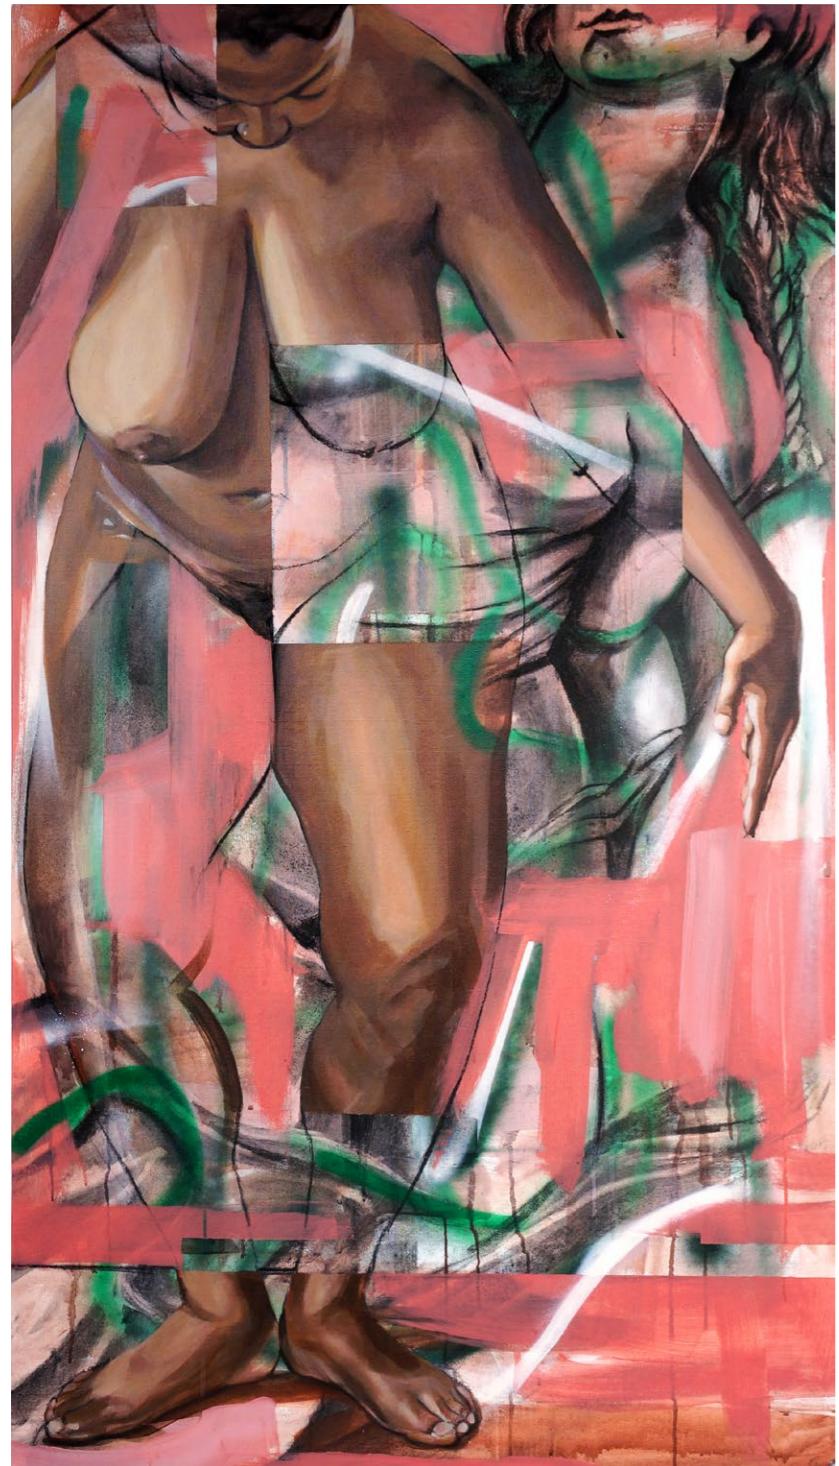

We three boisterously discuss all the pictures David shows us on the ‘three women’ theme, drink coffee, crack sexist jokes, and tease him. He can only sit and wait, and take the joking on the chin. But eventually he breaks into our messing about, wanting to explain more.

‘See these artists’ pictures of The Three Graces. In these classical paintings I cannot really say whether the idea was to please the looker, as we say now. But the fact is they are of women and were mostly painted by men.’ It is unavoidable: the images resulting from this session will be the recordings of a man’s eye. A man eyeing women.

But what images will we choose to give him?

At last, David picks up his camera. We are still sprawled, chatting, relaxing, a pleasant window draught keeping at bay the first mosquitoes. ‘So, my ladies, I do not think it is essential to remember the images we’ve been looking at, or the conventions, but I think we cannot ignore them either. And as for the voyeur – the witness of these moments... myself, the photographer... well, you must ignore me completely. I am not looking for a special pose – no. What I want, quite simply, is to catch moments from the “interrelation” between three women. I am not asking you to somehow please me.’

Four nationalities. A morning spent under a wooden roof with skylight views onto makeshift roof-gardens and rickety balconies and crammed-in house-fronts decorated with lines of washing strung like bunting. But we are disengaged from the world beyond David’s rooms, from the city of Shanghai. We women are enjoying being a threesome who started out as three aliens until we stripped ourselves down to the womanhood that unites us. We scrutinise each other’s bodies. We play with our contrasting skin tones, lining up our limbs and interweaving our torsos to create interesting images. It does me good; for three hours, my worries suspended. I love to laugh, and that is the main thing we do. David snaps, snaps, snaps, while the women laugh and laugh and laugh.
